

Comparison of Ambiguity in Arabic and Chinese and Its Translation Methods

The Chinese and Arabic languages are the most difficult and oldest languages. Despite the different rules and arrangement of sentences in the two languages, there is a common phenomenon between them, which is the phenomenon of linguistic ambiguity. With the development of language, new meanings appear every day, and words become insufficient to express these meanings, so one word expresses one or more meanings, and this phenomenon is called linguistic ambiguity. This phenomenon has caused misunderstanding among students, so if the student does not master the cultural background of the word or the environment in which it is said, it will be easy to have problems in communication. Therefore, this research will compare the phenomenon of linguistic confusion in the Chinese and Arabic languages, and will present methods of translating sentences that contain linguistic ambiguity, trying to help students understand it in a simple way.
